

EDUCATIONAL RALLY
WAS GRAND SUCCESSGOOD CROWD PRESENT TO HEAR
ADDRESSES AT COURT HOUSE.Practical Educators Talked Along Practical Lines, and All Present Felt Benefited.

According to announcement, the Alachua County School Improvement Association held a meeting at the court house Tuesday night, when many interested in education had the pleasure of hearing some most excellent addresses along these lines by speakers who, being educators themselves, handled the subject in a clever and practical manner. Even Congressman Frank Clark, who made the principal talk of the evening, stated that at the time he earned his living by teaching a country school in South Florida, hence was in a position to speak more intelligently upon what was considered one of the most important topics in the whole country at this time—the education of the children.

The meeting was called to order by Prof. W. H. Cassels, principal of the Gainesville Graded and High School, who presided throughout the evening. Prof. Cassels indulged in a talk of possibly a half hour, every moment of which was full of interest and good practical suggestions. At the close of his remarks he introduced Prof. Thaxton, of the University staff, who made a few brief but timely remarks, which were well received.

Frank Clark's Address.

At the conclusion of Prof. Thaxton's remarks the presiding officer, in a neat and clever manner, presented Congressman Frank Clark, which was a signal of applause as that gentleman arose and faced the audience.

Col. Clark, who is one of the most pleasing speakers in the State, seemed at his best upon this occasion, and for nearly an hour his remarks were listened to with the closest attention. The speaker said many good things, but insisted that the most important matter for consideration in this progressive age was the construction of good roads and a rural system of telephones. "I want to see the day when this grand country of ours will be a network of hard roads and telephone lines," he said, "for that means we will have good schools—they are bound to result from good roads, a generous telephone system, and other modern improvements, for these are instruments of education in themselves; and the day we see them, that day we will see a consolidation of small schools into large ones, which means the employment of more efficient instructors."

Mr. Clark said he used to earn a living teaching a country school in South Florida, and he realized keenly the disadvantages of the average teacher, especially in the country school, where disadvantageous conditions frequently exist of which the patrons or the public know nothing. He concluded his remarks by appealing to patrons to do their share towards making the teacher and the school a success.

A SHORT STORY

"The gilded rule," murmured the secretary, sighing down a growing anger, and thumping the leaves of his notebook mechanically. "The pedestal of dollars and cents."

He strove, in spite of himself, to catch that look of the other day, so fleeting and yet so full of promise. But now all responsiveness was blotted into a cold, measure stare, as she stood talking with her father.

"A gentleman, sir." It was one of the clerks in the outer office who spoke. "Don't go, Grace. I'll see who it is." And the broker disappeared behind the frosted door. The secretary caught his breath at this unexpected opportunity, and sought in the recess of his brain for some remark with which to open the conversation. The girl was gazing at the deep droop of a sagging cloud that was moving across the bit of window-framed sky.

"A doubtful day," he hazarded, as though following her thoughts. "Yes." There was a note of abrupt, cold finality that precluded further conversation. The girl was gazing at the window still. The face of the secretary set into a tense, hurt expression. The door leading into the private office opened again. "Mr. Bragdon, will you kindly step here a moment?" The broker's voice was gravely stern.

Wonderingly, the secretary rose and slowly entered the outer office. The sneering, silent contempt of the entire force met his gaze. "Mr. Bragdon, you have been in my employ for sometime, and—" smoothing out a tremulous agitation—"I trusted you. My business secrets were yours. How have you repaid my faith? By selling that information to my rivals?" "Mr. Atherton, I—" "Stop! Don't deny it; Langdon has absolute proof."

"Langdon is mistaken." "Langdon is never mistaken. Don't bluff, for I've found you out, you contemptible—" "Father!"

The girl stood on the threshold, flushed with eagerness of her defence. Her bosom heaved; her body quivered with an intense agitation. All the artificial barriers of sex and class distinction were swept aside. The true woman stood revealed. For one breathless moment she paused and then hastened impetuously to the side of the accused.

"Grace! Come away from that scoundrel!" "Father!" The pleading note was imbedded in an unshaken resolution. Her arms were outstretched, her eyes beseeched, but she remained as though rooted to the spot. Sheer anger turned the broker's face a chalky pallor. He tried to speak, but the excess of his emotion choked him. At last with a rasping snarl, he pointed to the outer door. The two went out in silence; the man dazed at the accusation, yet even now dimly conscious of a new joy creeping through his stupor; the girl strong and proud in her love. "See," she whispered suddenly, pointing through the corridor-window at the crimson glow of the dying sun, which seemed to shape the portals of some unknown paradise and hold them invitingly as a hidden refuge to the lovers. "The cloud has gone. This is a promise." They were intently watching the colors melt into a paler, more delicate hue, when a door swung open at the further end of the corridor.

"A note for you, Mr. Bragdon." The clerk's voice was one of abject apology. The secretary's fingers trembled as he straightened the folds in the paper and read, "Langdon is mistaken. Forgive me." "The promise is fulfilled," he whispered, as he bent over her.

The Value of Good Digestion

Is easy to figure if you know what your stomach is worth. Kodol keeps the stomach at par value, by insuring good digestion. Kodol cures Dyspepsia.

Kodol insures good digestion by absolutely duplicating Nature's normal process, in perfectly digesting all food taken into the stomach.

While Kodol is doing this, the stomach is resting—and becoming strong and healthy. A strong and healthy stomach guarantees a sound and active brain.

The man with a sound stomach—a stomach that is doing for the body just what Nature intended it to do—is the man who is always prepared for any emergency. He is "there with the goods."

The man with a sick stomach, is a man sick all over. When the stomach is irritated by undigested food, the blood and heart are directly affected. Then dullness, unnatural sleepiness, sick-headaches, vertigo and fainting spells, and even serious brain trouble develop. Kodol will prevent these.

Spurring the stomach and brain to special effort by "tonics" or "stimulants" doesn't cure anything, or accomplish any good. Neither does dieting. Indigestion and the serious ailments which it induces can be averted and corrected only by natural means.

Kodol supplies this natural means. It performs the stomach's work for it—just as the stomach should perform it—while the stomach takes a little rest, "for the stomach's sake."
